Nightfall at Sea.

Night folds her dusky wings before her face,
And all the silver stars peep shyly forth;
The sea has hushed the sighing of her dead,
The waning moon goes sailing to the north.

Night draws her mantle o'er the wearied stars,
No boat but rests upon the slumb'ring deep;
Only the night wind sighs a lullaby,
And, singing, woos the silver moon to sleep.

If we sailed away.

••••

If we sailed away in a tiny boat
With wings like a white sea bird,
And a sea so calm that our hempen sails
Were only so gently stirred,
Should we reach the spot where the sea meets sky,
And only come back in the sweet bye-and-bye?

Do you think some day that our boat would reach,
If we sailed till we both were old,
The waves that the sun as he sinks from sight
Turns purple and red, and gold?
Should we too rest when the shadows fall,
And never, oh! never come back at all?

Waves.

Laugh, laugh, laugh little waves,
And toss each foaming crest,
Each little wave in the blue, blue sea,
Tossing its head in wanton glee
And scorning, scorning rest.

Dance, dance, dance little waves,
And race across the sand;
Play, little waves, with the seaweed brown,
Faster and faster up and down,
And pass from hand to hand.

Rest, rest, rest little waves,
The wings of night are nigh,
Each little wave in slumber deep
Drowsily murmurs in its sleep,
And now and then a sigh.
